DISSERTATION ABSTRACT

“Form and Function of Expressive Morphology: A Case Study of Russian” (2008)

I conducted a detailed case study of expressive suffixes in Russian and showed that, although the suffixes under investigation have the same function (expressive), they differ significantly in their formal properties. I identified two major semantic types of expressive suffixes: attitude and size. Attitude suffixes convey the attitude of the speaker toward the referent. Size suffixes both convey attitude and refer to the size of the referent.

I argued that the two different semantic types map onto two different syntactic types. Attitude suffixes are syntactic heads, while size suffixes are syntactic modifiers. As heads, attitude suffixes determine the formal properties (syntactic category, grammatical gender, and inflectional class) of the derived form. As modifiers, size suffixes do not determine the formal properties of the derived form. Attitude suffixes can attach both to category-free $\sqrt{\text{Roots}}$ and to categories ($n/a/v$), while size suffixes can only attach to a noun category.

I investigated functional and formal properties of Russian expressive suffixes in a systematic way, which had not been done before. In doing so, I analyzed how expressive suffixes pattern with respect to several criteria (gender/class change, category change, subcategorization). An important byproduct of this analysis was an illustration of how grammatical gender of an expressive form can be predicted from its inflectional class (combined with animacy and natural gender of the base).
